the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are under 15 years of age has increased from 1.1 billion to 1.5 billion. This increase is due to the fact that the number of children under 15 years of age has increased in every country in the world, and the rate of increase is particularly high in developing countries.

The increase in the number of children under 15 years of age has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are in need of education. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion children under 15 years of age in the world, and 1.1 billion children were in need of education. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children under 15 years of age in the world, and 1.5 billion children were in need of education.

The increase in the number of children in need of education has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are out of school. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion children in need of education, and 1.1 billion children were out of school. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children in need of education, and 1.5 billion children were out of school.

The increase in the number of children out of school has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are illiterate. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion children out of school, and 1.1 billion children were illiterate. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children out of school, and 1.5 billion children were illiterate.

The increase in the number of children who are illiterate has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are unemployed. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion children who were illiterate, and 1.1 billion children were unemployed. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children who were illiterate, and 1.5 billion children were unemployed.

The increase in the number of children who are unemployed has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are poor. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion children who were unemployed, and 1.1 billion children were poor. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children who were unemployed, and 1.5 billion children were poor.

The increase in the number of children who are poor has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are hungry. In 1990, there were 1.1 billion children who were poor, and 1.1 billion children were hungry. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children who were poor, and 1.5 billion children were hungry.

The increase in the number of children who are hungry has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are malnourished. In 2000, there were 1.5 billion children who were malnourished, and 1.5 billion children were dying.

the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased from 10.5 million to 13.5 million, and the number of people aged 75 and over has increased from 4.5 million to 6.5 million (Office for National Statistics 2002).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of older people, and the UK Government has set out a strategy for the 21st century (Department of Health 2001). The strategy is based on the following principles: (1) to improve the health and well-being of older people; (2) to improve the quality of life of older people; (3) to improve the support and services available to older people; and (4) to improve the way in which older people are consulted and involved in decisions about their care and services.

the 1990s, the number of people with a mental health problem has increased in the UK (Mental Health Act 1983, 1990).

There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the lives of people with mental health problems. The Department of Health (1999) has set out a vision of a new mental health system, which will be based on the following principles:

- (i) people with mental health problems should be treated as individuals, with their own needs and wishes;
- (ii) people with mental health problems should be given the opportunity to participate in decisions about their care and treatment;
- (iii) people with mental health problems should be given the opportunity to live in their own homes and communities.

the 1990s, the number of people with a disability has increased in all countries, and this is expected to continue in the future.

There are a number of reasons for this increase. One of the main reasons is the increase in life expectancy. As people live longer, they are more likely to develop a disability. Another reason is the increase in the number of people who are injured or become disabled as a result of accidents or violence. A third reason is the increase in the number of people who are born with a disability.

The increase in the number of people with a disability has led to a number of challenges for society. One of the main challenges is the need for more accessible services and facilities. Another challenge is the need for more support and care for people with a disability. A third challenge is the need for more education and training for people with a disability.

There are a number of ways in which society can address these challenges. One way is to improve accessibility to services and facilities. Another way is to provide more support and care for people with a disability. A third way is to provide more education and training for people with a disability.

It is important that society takes action to address these challenges. If we do not, the number of people with a disability will continue to increase, and the challenges will become even more difficult to address.

There are a number of things that we can do to help people with a disability. We can make our services and facilities more accessible. We can provide more support and care for people with a disability. We can provide more education and training for people with a disability.

By taking these steps, we can help to improve the lives of people with a disability and ensure that they are able to participate fully in society.

There are a number of organizations that are working to help people with a disability. These organizations provide a range of services and support, including financial assistance, housing, and employment. If you are looking for help, there are a number of organizations that you can contact.

It is important that we all work together to help people with a disability. By taking these steps, we can ensure that everyone has the opportunity to live a full and active life.

The number of people aged 65 and over is projected to increase to 16.5 million by 2020, and the number of people aged 75 and over to 8.5 million (Office for National Statistics 2000).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of older people, and the need to ensure that they are able to live independently and actively in their own homes. The Department of Health (2000) has set out a strategy for older people, which includes a commitment to ensure that older people are able to live independently and actively in their own homes. This strategy is based on the principle of 'ageing in place', which means that older people should be able to live in their own homes for as long as possible, and to do so in a way that is safe, secure, and comfortable.

The Department of Health (2000) has identified a number of key areas for action, including: (1) ensuring that older people have access to the services and support they need to live independently and actively in their own homes; (2) ensuring that older people are able to live in their own homes in a way that is safe, secure, and comfortable; and (3) ensuring that older people are able to live in their own homes in a way that is affordable. The Department of Health (2000) has also identified a number of key areas for research, including: (1) the need to develop new services and support for older people; (2) the need to improve the quality of services and support for older people; and (3) the need to ensure that services and support for older people are affordable.
